

Career Relief Pitching

By Jim Weigand

The following tables are generated from a database comprised of the “relief splits” as reported in Retrosheet. 500 career relief games (GR) are required for inclusion, yielding 174 qualifiers, and only relief data is counted. Interestingly, no reliever who qualified began his career before 1950. Each table consists of the top 15 and bottom 5 qualifiers.

ERA and several other measures represent earned runs per 9 innings pitched. This is misleading for relievers. However, we have become comfortable with these measures and they do not alter the order of the lists, so I have retained the events over 9 innings.

Retrosheet data is so extensive that we can determine slugging averages as well as batting averages. The only adjustment that needs to be made is to include the interference data, so that at bats can be accurately calculated. On base average is calculated without the inclusion of sacrifice flies. Their presence is a result of a misguided and erroneous conclusion that all sacrifice bunts are selfless acts and all sacrifice flies are selfish acts. Since every intention of every batter is unknowable, I’m comfortable with disregarding both. So in these tables, on base average is calculated using only at bats, hits, walks and hit batsmen.

I have avoided coming up with an overriding measurement for relief pitchers. Condensing this data into one number per reliever would be attractive, but subjective. However, a good argument can be made for Mariano Rivera being the best reliever in baseball history. He finished out of the top fifteen in only two categories and out of the top seven in only three:
